The portfolio's net return for the month of January 2026 was -4.9%, which compares with the MSCI World Index (USD) return of +2.2%.

Since inception in May 2025, the GCQ Flagship Offshore Fund has returned -1.5%, whereas the MSCI World Index (USD) has returned +24.9%.

The recent performance, while disappointing, has not been triggered by any deterioration in the fundamentals of the portfolio, which continues to grow revenue at +12% p.a. and free cash flow at +17% p.a. over the next five years, but broad-based multiple compression driven by concerns around disruption from Artificial Intelligence (AI).

Our January update typically sets out a detailed update on quarterly earnings for our portfolio. However, given the recent sell-off in software, information services, and internet companies, which collectively represent a meaningful portion of our portfolio, we thought it would be helpful to step back and look at some of the underlying secular trends in our portfolio of monopolies, oligopolies, and irreplaceable brands.

Importantly, the recent performance, while disappointing, has not been triggered by any deterioration in the fundamentals of the portfolio, which continues to grow revenue at +12% p.a. and free cash flow at +17% p.a. over the next five years. Rather, the sell-off reflects broad-based multiple compression.

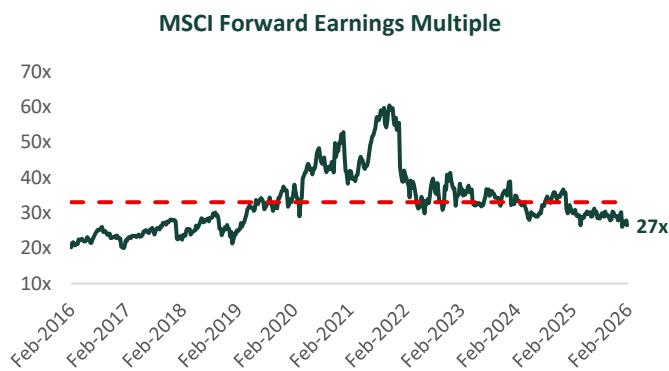

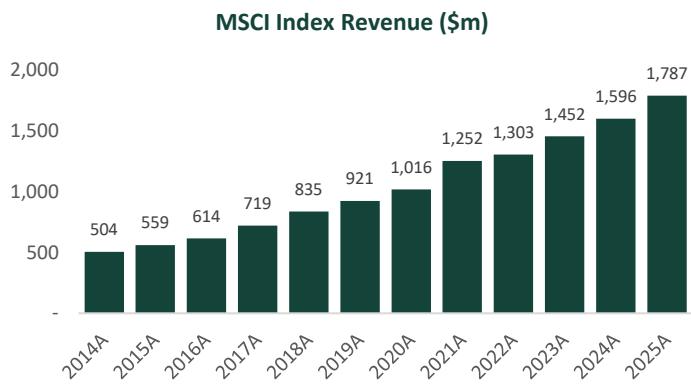

It is for this reason that we view this sell-off as a rare opportunity to buy a collection of wonderful businesses at a deep discount to our appraisal of fair value. On the following pages, we highlight the current multiples of our largest individual positions relative to their own historical valuation range, which, combined with strong and improving fundamental performance, gives us conviction that we will deliver very strong returns for investors from here.

Our largest position, Amazon, continued to deliver strong revenue growth, including a reacceleration in growth from Amazon Web Services (AWS), its industry-leading cloud computing infrastructure business, to +24% year-on-year. Despite this, Amazon is trading at its lowest forward earnings valuation in recent memory, with its share price performance over the past three years more than underpinned by earnings growth and earnings upgrades – i.e., higher-than-expected earnings, which lead estimates to be revised upwards.

It is worth reiterating that despite fears of AI-driven disruption, thus far we have seen no discernible impact to revenue or margins for any of our portfolio companies. In fact, most of our companies continue to deliver revenue and earnings above market expectations.

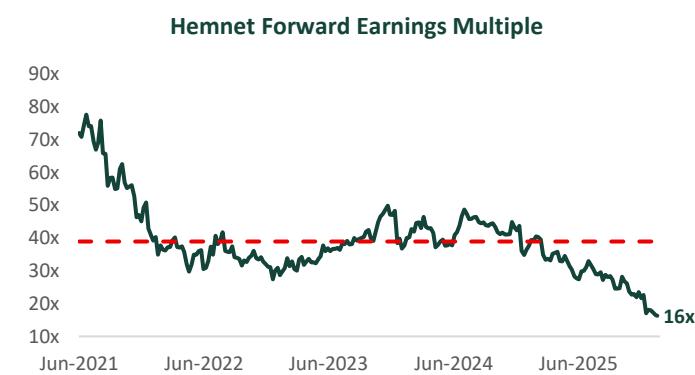

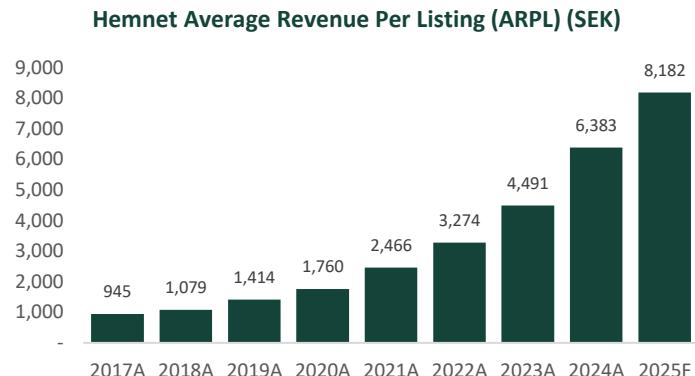

Similarly, MSCI recorded another record quarter, with revenue growth of +11% year-on-year, while earnings per share grew +12% year-on-year, underpinned by continued growth in its dominant index franchise, up +14% year-on-year. However, in early-February, MSCI could not escape an indiscriminate sell-off in information services companies on the back of broad-based fears that Artificial Intelligence (AI) would disrupt workflows. MSCI is also trading below its average valuation, which we find incredibly attractive for a business that earns a royalty on the growth of the equity market.

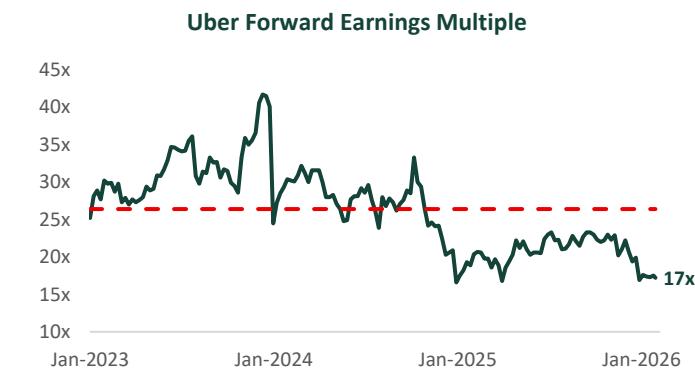

Hemnet, which has been our largest detractor in the past six months, delivered +29% year-over-year growth in Average Revenue Per Listing (ARPL), despite continued weakness in the listings environment. Hemnet is now trading at its lowest multiple since listing, and at a discount to other listed property portals, despite a longer runway of revenue growth from price increases and premiumisation, while earnings are cyclically depressed by the macroeconomic environment in Sweden.

Uber continues to deliver strong growth in revenue and earnings, but is also trading at its lowest forward earnings valuation in history. We believe Autonomous Vehicles (AVs) will significantly expand Uber's total addressable market. By lowering the cost per trip, AVs will unlock new consumer use cases – much like Uber's initial disruption grew the market far beyond the traditional taxi industry.

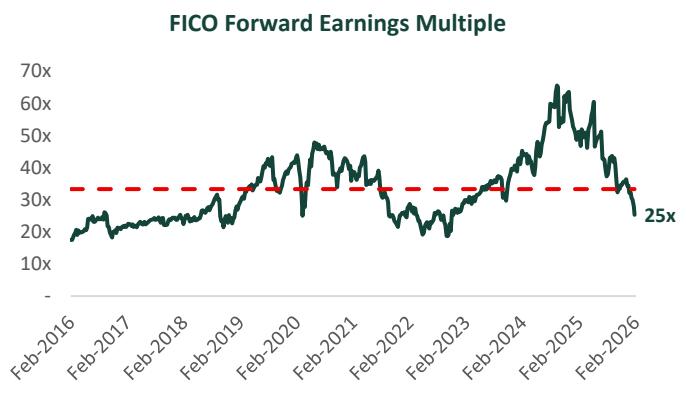

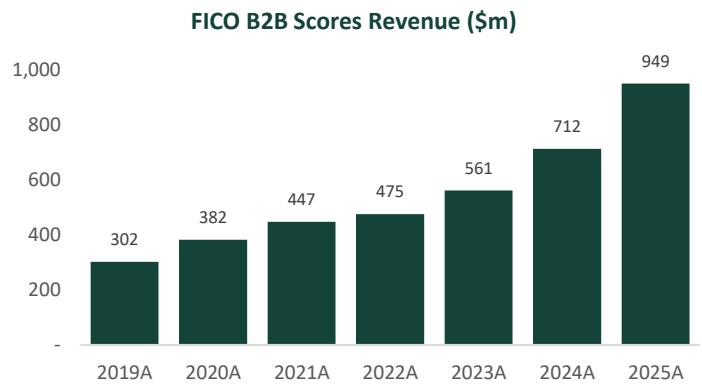

Visa delivered yet another quarter of sustained double-digit growth in earnings, yet its multiple is also trading near multi-year lows.

We liken these situations to a “coiled spring” – where growth in a company’s intrinsic value lags its share price performance. Visa has delivered a total return of +22% p.a. since listing in 2008, and we believe it continues to be undervalued by the market.

In some cases, companies with incredibly strong and improving fundamentals have faced indiscriminate selling simply due to their classification in the “software” industry. For instance, FICO is technically classified as a Software business by The Global Industry Classification Standard (GICS). In reality, the company makes money from its near-monopoly credit score franchise in the US. FICO’s Scores business is protected by multi-sided network effects between credit bureaus, lenders, investors, consumers, and regulators, where it is the industry standard “language” of communicating consumer credit risk in the U.S.

During the quarter, FICO’s Scores business grew revenues by +29% year-on-year, +5% above consensus. We see meaningful valuation upside to the current price.
